Remarks:

1. beginning in June 1950 all jurisdictions set about readjusting the relationship between public and private grain firms in the spirit of the 3d Plenum of the 7th CPC Central Committee and centralized state plans for the readjustment of industry and commerce in order to help legitimate privately owned grain business get out of their predicament. The emphasis of the readjustment was on price policies, meaning the formulation of suitable differential prices for different areas and wholesale and retail differential prices, thereby enabling private merchants to make a profit. Second was the scope of business, setting a rational division of labor in grain procurement.
2. *Liu Shaoqi, Chen Yun, and Nie Rongzhen gave reports on identical topics at the June 14-23, 1950, Second Session of the First CPPCC.
3. This plenum convened during a radical retrenchment in fiscal policy that had produced a temporary but severe recession in China by late spring 1950.
4. Rectification of 1950 was to be a "top-to-bottom" inner-Party campaign with only limited participation by non-Party officials. The recruitment of peasants in the old liberated areas was stopped altogether, and the recruitment of peasants in the newly liberated areas was postponed until after land reform. In contrast, a full one-third of the urban working class was to be absorbed into the Party in the next three to five years, so that the Party might truly become the vanguard of the proletariat. The directive also called for a re-examination of the qualifications of current Party members, more intensive education in Party doctrine and programs, and reorganization of basic-level Party branches throughout the country. *Organizing China: The Problem of Bureaucracy, 1949-1976. 5. These decisions were reaffirmed by an enlarged meeting of the Politburo in February 1951. Meeting 10-02-1950
6. Rectification of 1950. A campaign initiated at the 3rd Plenum against the arrogance, BUREAUCRATISM, and COMMANDISM that had arisen in the Party after the seizure of nationwide power. The campaign was distinguished from its predecessors, the CHENG-FENG MOVEMENT and the RECTIFICATION OF 1947-48, in being more lenient and more tightly controlled. Organizing China: The Problem of Bureaucracy, 1949-1976. Contributors: Harry Harding - author. Publisher: Stanford University Press. Place of Publication: Stanford, CA. Publication Year: 1981. Page Number: 394
7. The mildness of the campaign can also be deduced from its practical orientation reflecting a high priority attached to the efficient performance of governmental functions. Great emphasis was placed on integrating rectification and regular work; documents under study included detailed policy decisions on current tasks as well as theoretical tracts on self-criticism. Press reports insisted the proper way to implement the campaign was to investigate the ordinary affairs of the unit concerned, and strong criticism was levelled at tendencies to carry out rectification in an abstract fashion without dealing with actual problems encountered in performing duties. This emphasis on the regular tasks of administrative units indicates not only minimum disruption of work routine, it also implies strict curbs on coercive measures which would result in such disruption. The apparent persuasive orientation of the 1950 campaign was appropriate to the problems confronted -- problems which were seen as non-antagonistic contradictions stemming from difficulties cadres had in adjusting to new responsibilities and policies, uneasy relations of diverse types within the new administrative structure, and the general inability of Party authorities to provide adequate ideological training in the final days of the civil war. These were all matters of achieving a proper understanding of a new and complex situation, and thus suited to an educational approach. *Politics & Purges in China: Rectification and the Decline of Party Norms, 1950-1965. 8. Mao warned the assembled leaders on 6 June 1950 to prepare for a battle to the death: 'Landreform in a population of over 300 million people is a vicious war. It is more arduous, more complex, more troublesome than crossing the Yangzi, because our troops are 260 million peasant soldiers. This is a war for land reform, this is the most hideous class war between peasants and landlords. It is a battle to the death.' Mao Zedong quoted in a speech by Deng Zihui on the spirit of the Third Plenum of the Seventh Central Committee of the CPC, 10 July 1950, Hubei, SZ1-2-15, p. 29
9. 'The entire country is tense,' Mao noted, and 'we are rather lonely'. The party had to make friends and isolate its enemies one by one. Ease up the pressure on the ethnic minorities, he advocated. Appease private merchants, create a united front with democrats and take a long view in reforming intellectuals. 'Advance slowly.' Mao Zedong quoted in a speech by Deng Zihui on the spirit of the Third Plenum of the Seventh Central Committee of the CPC, 10 July 1950, Hubei, SZ1-2-15, pp. 19–47; needless to say, these uncensored quotations are substantially different from the published speech in Mao's collected writings. The Tragedy of Liberation
